

It is my firmly established belief that the reversal of this practice will only serve to further focus media control into the hands of a few wealthy corporations and thus weaken the power of the media to inform the public. The convergence that has occurred in broadcast media already shows how badly warped things have become, with a small number of conglomerates in control of all but a handful of cable, radio, and TV channels. To provide the most varied coverage, the FCC must continue to limit the amount of control that a single company can have.
